A randomized controlled study of a novel knee arthroscopic apparatus for posterior cruciate ligament reconstruction: is it safe? Loosening of the cruciate ligaments during a posterior cruciate ligament reconstruction is a relatively common complication, which can lead to joint instability, pain, and functional impairment. The purpose of this study was to compare the function and degenerative changes in the knees of patients who underwent arthroscopic posterior cruciate ligament reconstruction using a novel locking mechanism compared with those who underwent arthroscopic posterior cruciate ligament reconstruction using a traditional screw fixation technique. A prospective randomized controlled study was conducted on 90 patients who underwent arthroscopic posterior cruciate ligament reconstruction with hamstring tendon using either the novel locking mechanism or a traditional two-screw fixation technique. Patients who underwent arthroscopic posterior cruciate ligament reconstruction using a traditional two-screw technique were included in the traditional group. The patients were assessed before surgery and at 1-year follow-up for knee function, clinical symptom assessment, and using an activity-specific questionnaire. Magnetic resonance imaging was performed preoperatively and at 1-year follow-up to investigate for degenerative changes in the knees. There were no significant differences in knee function, clinical symptom assessment, or activity-specific score between the two groups at the 1-year follow-up. Magnetic resonance imaging analysis showed no significant differences in the tibiofemoral compartment between the two groups. There was no difference in patient satisfaction between the two groups, and the novel locking mechanism for arthroscopic posterior cruciate ligament reconstruction is safe.
