Ochratoxin A (OTA) is a common mycotoxin produced by a wide range of fungi and considered as a potential carcinogenic and nephrotoxic compound. It inhibits the synthesis of the 70S ribosomes in eukaryotic cells causing a series of effects on cell division, protein synthesis and other cellular functions. OTA also induces the production of enzymes with metallo-beta-lactamase (MBL) activity by several bacterial species and therefore it has been hypothesized that metallo-beta-lactamase producing bacteria could be involved in the biotransformation of OTA and the detoxification of its metabolites. In this work, we have analyzed the induction of MBL activity in a collection of 57 strains of Clostridium sporogenes, isolated from different sources. All of the strains were collected from the European Collection of Microorganisms (ECM) of the University of Gothenburg and were isolated from food and humans. All strains were divided into two groups: the first group (28 strains) was the collection of non-producers of MBLs (MPB) and the second group (28 strains) contained the producers of MBLs (648931e174
