Ask HN: Is there a way to solve the secret keys problem using public key authentication - blargh I've been coming up against the typical problem of shared secret keysIn my case, we run a multiplayer game which is essentially the same game but it is playable from either device's point of view, so the device to device communication is equivalent to a server to client communication, and clients often connect to the same server. Sometimes, a friend on my network needs to connect their device, but I don't know their username and password. My "normal" username and password won't work. You can't use the client's username and password on the device, because their password could be stolen. If I enter their username and password on my device, the server d0c515b9f4
